In post-poaching era, Bodo wives turn to culinary skills at Manas National Park

While the Government has made significant strides in its efforts to combat poaching in the park, the Bodos, who were once a nomadic tribe, have had to adapt to a sedentary lifestyle. They have turned to agriculture and animal husbandry as their primary sources of income. The Bodos are known for their unique culinary skills, particularly their mastery of rice-based dishes. The park's administration has recognized the importance of preserving these traditions and has provided training and resources to help the Bodos develop their culinary skills. This has not only helped to sustain their culture, but has also provided them with a sustainable livelihood.
